4 / 4 Beauty: Royal Fern I was lucky enough to try the Royal Fern skincare range this week and am soon to become a clean beauty convert as a result. The powerful fern plant acts as the base ingredient of its products, with it being intensely moisturising and also highly resistant to sunlight. As a result of these properties, studies led by dermatologist Dr. Timm Golueke and his team in Germany are proving natural fern extracts to combat skin aging on all levels. The products, ranging from a phytoactive cleansing balm to anti-aging creams and serums launch at Harvey Nichols Hong Kong at the end of this month. royalfern.com

3 / 5 Eat: Neighborhood I think I've finally found my favourite restaurant in Hong Kong. For me, Neighborhood is the best of all worlds in terms of both food and ambience. It's tucked in a little nook just off of Hollywood road so you have both convenience and discreetness. The interior is modern but unpretentious and cosy. The dishes are a fusion of Italian and French and served tapas-style so you can double up on variety and share the experience with your friends. The padron peppers with cheese excelled in its simplicity, while the pigeon eggs with chorizo crumbs were so indulgent yet balanced. G/F, 61-63 Hollywood Road, Soho Central

3 / 3 Eat: La Rambla's Sunday Brunch Fiesta Having quickly established itself as one of the best places in Hong Kong for Catalan cuisine, La Rambla isn't resting on its laurels with the introduction of its Sunday En La Boqueria Brunch. At $550, the brunch pays tribute to famous Barcelona food market La Boqueria, and includes an assortment of tapas, meat and seafood offerings from the menu, along with a buffet bar complete with all-you-can-eat Iberico ham, and an eggs station. Favourites of mine included the tiger prawns grilled to perfection in their shells over charcoal, and the handmade nitrogen ice cream which is mixed table-side, resulting in the smoothest texture you can imagine. larambla.hk
